Here's what happened to one of our own...

"My wife and I were having a weekend getaway in downtown Ottawa. The hotel had underground parking, and since my van has a raised roof, it had to be parked outside. When we arrived, I asked to park the vehicle myself but was told by the valet that he would have to park it. I explained to him that the van had hand controls and would function normally and that he shouldn't use the hand controls. He said 'no problem', and we went to check in. We were no sooner in our room than we received a call from the front desk asking us to come back down. The valet had decided to try the hand controls as he was backing into a parking space, and instead of braking he accelerated into a large cement pillar. The rear of my van was all smashed in and even though they apologized and assured me that they would pay for the damage, I no longer had a vehicle. They offered to pay for a rental, but there were none available with hand controls so I was left with no vehicle for the two weeks it took to repair my van. I am pleased that new hand controls are available with a lockout feature so that this situation will not occur in the future." - Don Johnston, Owner of Liftability, Ottawa
